Author Interview Questions

- You started writing a book in your early 20s about questions to a God you hope exists. What took you so long?!
- In your book you write about how you felt that church was more interested in itself than in really understanding you as a young adult. How do you look at that with regard to faith communities today?
- You've been a lifelong writer, even getting a master's degree in writing. What is it you like about spiritual writing?
- You have a question mark in your title. What does that signal to the reader about your book?
- Near the beginning of the book, you share the story of learning your brother was an atheist. Tell us more about that experience and how it informed your approach to faith going forward.
- A lot of your early readers have said that your book is ... funny! We don't always hear that adjective applied to spiritual writing. What role does humor play in your writing and in your relationship with God?
- What kind of reader do you think will enjoy your book the most? Who do you think will hate it?
- What is the most surprising thing you discovered as you were writing and editing the book?
- How would you describe your faith life today, at this very minute?
- Where can people find you?
